

World wide water shortage

Water shortage is a world wide problem, not only restricted to the well known dry countries. Besides private households, industry and agriculture are large water consumers. Even in areas with rivers, lakes and a wet climate, there can be a water shortage. The map above shows the expected shortage in the year 2020.

Why reducing water usage

- Less shortage of fresh water. The shortage shows in the following ways: lower soil water levels, dry riverbeds and lakes, need for more desalination plants.
- Less wastewater. Wastewater needs to be cleansed before it can be discharged. Less water usage means less plants and energy needed for cleansing.
- Lower energy consumption. The purification of water, transportation and cleansing afterwards, all cost a lot of energy. Lower water consumption means lower energy consumption and results into lower CO₂ production.
